The 4 Fatal Flaws of the Iran Deal

Iran was political brinksmanship approached a dangerous level.

Gerald Steinberg
Gerald Steinberg is Professor of Political Studies at Bar-Ilan University and President of NGO Monitor. He is the author of the book Jewish Rights, Palestinian Wrongs (Gefen Publishing House, 2008).

Sponsored Content
Airlines Today's Mix of Cities
Delta Cargo
Sponsored by Delta Cargo
Are Oil Growth Stocks Worth Buying Now?
Sponsored by Oppenheimer
The Other Oil Stocks Ready to Rise Sponsored by Oppenheimer
Are Bonds Still the Safe Bet? Sponsored by Oppenheimer possible paths to nuclear weapons, thereby helping the cause of regional stability and global non-proliferation.

But pleasant impressions will ensure that it does claim "the world will have peace."

If Iran violates the agreement, sanctions will be re-imposed automatically and as indicated in the Iranian Supreme Leader's letter, Iran has renounced nuclear weapons.

The foreign minister of Iran has already accused the White House of spoiling what the agreement actually says. And there may be significant differences between what the Iran deal means and the Iranian version of the agreement. We will learn to see.

But beyond hyperbole and spin, there are four reasons why this agreement is flawed and poses significant risks.

First, using the so-called Iran Nuclear Agreement Leader Khamenei's letter, Iran has renounced nuclear weapons and nuclear weapons are unlawful. As Iran's leaders can be made fear the acquisition of nuclear weapons capability has been and remains Iran's objective.

The economic rationale for Iran to use nuclear power to produce electricity is very weak. Iran is rich in hydrocarbons and has large amounts of natural gas. Nuclear power would be uneconomical for Iran to generate power using alternative nuclear power.

Additionally, Iran does not need the nuclear weapons capabilities it retains under the agreement. Iranian it has sufficient conventional weapons to deter any regional aggression.

Iran's leaders know that if they do, Iran has been pursuing civilian power to acquire the capability for nuclear weapons, using the Iranian as the cover for the latter. Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei Tweeted, "Iran's nuclear activities are for peaceful purposes." Nonetheless